Museum of Flight buys room to stretch its wings

The Museum of Flight has signed an agreement to purchase 6.5 acres for expansion across East Marginal Way from the existing museum.

Among other things, a Space Gallery is planned for the property, the museum said. It also will eventually be home to the Aviation High School that is now at the north end of Boeing Field. A covered structure to be built on the property will house a number of the museum's large airplanes that are currently stored outdoors.

"The Museum of Flight was virtually landlocked and in need of room to continue our growth," former astronaut Bonnie Dunbar, museum president and chief executive, said in a statement.

The land, which was acquired from Mark Robison and Bill Davis, principal owners of Container Properties, is adjacent to property already owned by the museum that is now used as an outdoor site for such planes as the Concorde supersonic transport.

The land was once a chemical manufacturing site but has been cleaned up, according to the Environmental Protection Agency.

Shareholders invited to Tully's annual meeting

Seattle-based Tully's Coffee Corp. will hold its annual shareholders meeting at 8 a.m. March 29 at Seattle's Museum of Flight, the company announced Thursday.

Shareholders will be asked to vote on the election of seven directors and ratification of the appointment of independent accountants.
